R. C. WILSON, Publisher.

EDITORIAL.

It is in the Creed of every Depository Banking house that all men and women of credit may freely deposit and withdraw at any time. The bank thus becomes, as it were, a receptacle for the current of wealth, in which all may lay up its surplus, and draw and withdraw at pleasure. The bank is to the country what the canals and railroads are to the state, or what the telegraph and railroad are to the country. The bank is a means of communication, and it is a means of transportation. It is the first and most important of all the means of communication and transportation.

The banks of the country are the arteries of the economy, the blood-vessels of the state, and the life-sustaining force of the nation. They are the great central depositories for the wealth of the country, and the agencies through which it is carried on and distributed. They are the channels through which the money of the country is carried from one part to another, and from one state to another, and from one nation to another. They are the means by which the money of the country is brought to bear upon the wants and necessities of the people, and by which the wealth of the country is distributed to the various parts of the community. They are the mainstay of the economy, the great support of the state, and the life-sustaining force of the nation.
