GROWING BETTER.

“Hatter” Rusts In Russia

ONCE there was a Russian farmer named Moroz. Moroz, you know, is a winter and he used to grow a large garden of apples. Moroz and his wife always put two baskets of apples into the smokehouse. One was for the baking and the other for the winter. But one year, Moroz noticed that the apples in the first basket were quickly turning bitter. He thought that maybe the smokehouse was not working properly, so he took one apple from each basket and put it into the smokehouse to see if it would improve the apples. As soon as he put the bitter apple into the smokehouse, it turned sweet again. Moroz was delighted and said, “I will never again trust the apple that is bitter!”

Dr. H. J. Oake has received a large order for his “Hatter” rusts. He says that this rust will be very beneficial for growing apples in Russia. Moroz will certainly want to try it, and soon all the apple growers will be using it. More information about

Dr. Oake’s “Hatter” rust is available at the local agricultural center.

A FROST.

The farmer who owns the apple grove in the town of Zara, Russia, is very worried because there has been a frost. This frost has ruined all the apples that were ready for picking.

The farmer is very disappointed and worried because he has invested a lot of money in his apple grove.

But the farmer is not giving up. He is going to try to salvage what he can and see if he can find another way to make a profit. He is going to plant new trees and try to start over.

Frost is a natural part of growing apples. It is not something that can be easily avoided. But with hard work and determination, the farmer can still succeed.
