UPTON SINCLAIR STRIKES BACK

Author of "Junglist Range." "Puins of Past." and "Wildlife of Wild..."

In a recent issue of the Saturday Review, Mr. Upton Sinclair, in an article which makes the assertion that the present "strike movement" is an "impossible project," was quoted as saying that "the strike is a failure in every case, from the standpoint of those who would see it as a strike." He went on to say, "The strike is a failure in every case, from the standpoint of those who would see it as a strike."

However, Mr. Sinclair's article "Strikes: A Study" was published in 1912, well before the current movement. It is likely that his views have changed since then. The current movement, for example, is much larger and more diverse than the one he describes. It includes workers from many different industries and occupations, as well as a wide range of social and political issues.

The strike movement today is not the same as it was in 1912. The current movement is much more sophisticated and has a much better understanding of the legal and political aspects of the strike. The current movement is also much more organized and has a much better understanding of the economic and social issues involved.
