CHAPTER XI

The next day was St. Patrick's Day, and that morning the sun was shining brightly. Bill Danlken had decided that he would go into town and buy some books to read during the week. He started early, and by ten o'clock he was in town. He walked into the store and asked for some books to read during the week. The storekeeper gave him a few recommendations, and Bill Danlken picked out a few books that interested him. He then walked out of the store and headed for the library. In the library, he found a few books that he had never read before, and he decided to borrow them for the week. That afternoon, he walked back to his farm and spent the rest of the day reading the books he had borrowed. At night, he went to bed early and read the book he had borrowed that day. The next morning, he woke up early and read the book he had borrowed the day before. He continued this routine for the rest of the week, and by the end of the week, he had read all the books he had borrowed. He was pleased with himself for having decided to read during the week, and he decided to continue reading during the following week. He was also pleased with himself for having decided to spend his money on books instead of on alcohol, as he had done in the past. He knew that reading books was a better way to spend his money, and he was pleased with himself for having made this decision.
LISTEN!!

AND MAN has ever retired on the money he spent! Like the Horse of Sennacherib on the surface water, it is in the effect of a little deferred dollars in the commercial circle. The great river gets in strength gradually—and so may you. But there must be a beginning here somewhere, and under your guidance, we single out four percent. A hundred postcards is enough to open a successful account, and every dollar you save will earn four percent.
